Dominicans in New York: An Exhibit from the Dominican Archives and Library Collections highlights the experiences and contributions of the New York Dominican population. The exhibit uses primary source materials from the archival collections of the Dominican Archives as well as secondary source materials from the Dominican Library including documents, photographs and memorabilia to create a visual history of Dominicans as they developed communities that became an integral part of New York’s diverse human landscape. These communities are a prime example of the new historical currents affecting the major cities of the world during the last fifty years.

The purpose of the exhibit is to introduce, through carefully selected images, the complexity of the Dominican experience in New York to the general public, students, scholars and policy makers. The images display glimpses of the community’s history, culture, traditions, and population changes.

Juan A. Paulino was a civic leader whose accomplishments include the founding of one of the first Dominican cultural organizations in the United States. Born in the city of Santiago de los Caballeros, Dominican Republic in 1931, he migrated to New York City in 1962.

In 1963, encouraged by the activities of the New York Puerto Rican community, Juan Paulino envisioned building a monument in honor of Juan Pablo Duarte y Díaz, founding father of the Dominican Republic. In 1966, in collaboration with Normandía Maldonado, Víctor Liriano, Marina Maldonado and Manuel Medrano, Paulino founded the Club Cívico Cultural Juan Pablo Duarte (now the Instituto Duartiano de los Estados Unidos), with the commitment of promoting public awareness about Duarte’s ideals. The group lobbied local government officials and the Dominican community in New York, as well as the Dominican government, to erect a statue in honor of Duarte. Also, in recognition of his dedication to promote Dominican culture, Paulino was awarded the Order of Merit of Duarte, Sánchez, and Mella in 1971 by the Dominican Government, the highest recognition given to Dominican citizens. He was the first Dominican migrant to receive it.

On January 26, 1978, a statue of Juan Pablo Duarte was inaugurated in the Juan Pablo Duarte Plaza at Canal Street and Avenue of the Americas. The statue was a donation by Dominican President Joaquín Balaguer to the City of New York on behalf of the New York Dominican community.

Juan A. Paulino was the first person to donate a personal documents collection to the Dominican Studies Institute Archives, as he believed that “these documents are historical and must be preserved.” His collection contains correspondence, photographs, invitations, minutes of meetings, newspaper clippings, certificates, awards and proclamations, as well as audiovisuals pertaining to his civic activities and personal life.

The Tito Enrique Cánepa Collection

Tito Enrique Cánepa Biographical Information

Born in 1916 in San Pedro de Macorís, Dominican Republic, Tito Enrique Cánepa Jiménez is a unique case of a Dominican migrant who traveled to New York City as a young man in the late 1930s and became a consummate painter that never lost sight of his beloved Dominican culture.

Immediately upon his arrival in New York, Tito Cánepa found employment at Mexican muralist David Alfaro Siqueiros’ New York Experimental Workshop, working under Bolivian painter Roberto Berdecio. In addition to these two master painters, another key influence in Tito Cánepa’s artistic development was Dominican art historian Américo Lugo Romera, with whom Cánepa studied the Italian Renaissance classics via their visits to the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

What had begun as an adolescent rebelliousness against the Trujillo dictatorship in Tito Cánepa’s country of origin, manifested itself, in his mature years, as a commitment to social justice, international solidarity, and freedom as principles of life. Throughout his six decades living in New York—which have made him the senior of all Dominican painters in the City—Cánepa had an artistic trajectory in which experts note a distinct personality and a strong connection with Latin America.

The Tito Enrique Cánepa Collection consists of correspondence between he and his cousin, Juan Isidro Jiménez Grullón, drawings and sketches, photographs, motion pictures, and other documents generated, produced or collected by Cánepa from c. 1939 to 1992.
